County Wins Alondra Park Oil Rights

Los Angeles county has come out on top in a court contest involving ownership of gas and oil rights on land acquired for development of Alondra Park, Harold W. Kennedy, county counsel, reported recently.

Kennedy said the property was condemned by the county in 1926, and later oil was discovered in the vicinity.

Oil speculators paid the county a $51,000 bonus for an oil lease on its property, and then the Somers Estate Corporation, one of the former owners, brought suit to prevent the county from extracting oil.

It was contended in the suit that the county merely held an easement on the land, the oil rights remaining with the previous owners, but the superior court held last March 29 that Los Angeles owned the property in fee simple which included oil, gas, and hydro-carbon substances underground.

It may well be, too, that some V-2, or our own atomic bomb, of the technique which appeared experimentally in the last war may be commonplace and routine in the next—such as radar, and blind bombing.

A co-author with General Hap Arnold of three books on military aviation, the general warned the audience:

"There is the greatest probability that the first battlefields of the next war will be the industrial cities of the United States. No aggressor who has neglected to depreciate the manpower or destroy the material resources of the United States can hope to win.

"Finally, over all this business of sound organization, modern weapons and mobilized industry and manpower, rides this dominant fact—no nation is secure unless the citizen places the welfare of his country above his personal self-interest.

During the war the national interest was dominant. Now there are many signs and there is grave danger that personal interest and selfish welfare of highly organized minorities are being placed above the national interest, the welfare of all the people."
